Peer review is one of the most critical processes in scholarly publishing allowing detailed evaluation of a research study by experts in the same field. Serving as a peer reviewer does not only signifies the expertise of a researcher in his area of interest but also helps in gaining recognition in the research community. Determining whether a submitted work can be published based on its validity and credibility is as important as having publications in the peer-reviewed journals for a flourishing academic career. This webinar aims to guide researchers to become a part of this rigorous but vital process by providing tips on conducting the review process.

Through this webinar, researchers will learn:

- Overview of the peer review process
- Various peer review models adopted by journals
- How do journals select reviewers for a manuscript?
- Why becoming a peer reviewer is critical for researchers' career progression?
- Tips on evaluating each section of the research paper
- How to draft a review report?
- Ethical practices that need to be followed by peer reviewers
